

TSA Agents Still Indecently Assaulting Children

By Alexander Baron - Jan 13, 2016

5
SHARES

It is ironic, is it not, that at a time when on one side of the Atlantic ageing celebrities are having their names dragged through the mud and seeing themselves dragged into court for allegedly touching some demented female inappropriately ten, twenty or more years ago that on the other side, the US Government employs people who are paid as part of their job description to grope underage girls and boys?

After the terrible atrocities of September 11, 2001, every reasonably intelligent person everywhere realised the world would never be the same again, and that this would include especially airport security. The American response in this department was the Transportation Security Administration, which was set up almost immediately, in November the same year.

While there have been attempts, there has been no repeat of 9/11. However, the TSA has come in for a great deal of criticism for the way its staff interact with the public, including the young. This video, which was uploaded to YouTube recently by an enraged father, shows how his ten year old daughter was aggressively searched.

Another video includes this and some comment on airport security set to music. Finally, this one shows that even TSA supervisors need to learn some basic interpersonal skills; these people may be paid agents of state repression, but they are also public servants.

5
SHARES

Alexander Baron

<http://www.infotextmanuscripts.org>