

The Rise Of The Professional Victim

How can you win fame and fortune by doing something absolutely useless? For some time the answer has been to become a professional victim. The vast majority but by no means all of these people are women. You become a professional victim by surviving a rape, even if the so-called rape was consensual, even if it never happened. You become a victim by claiming to be a survivor of childhood sexual abuse, even if this abuse never happened. You become a victim by receiving a slew of abuse including rape threats and death threats on Twitter, threats and abuse you would never dream of blocking, even though you have no hesitation in blocking anyone and everyone who exposes your false narratives with reason, logic, and rational argument.

Laura Bates

Professional victims include Laura Bates, founder of the Everyday Whining Project, and Connie St Louis, the latter of whom appeared on the BBC TV programme The Big Questions recently where she sparred unsuccessfully with self-styled Dangerous Faggot Milo Yiannopoulos. Connie complained vociferously that she receives deluges of hate mail which all seem to relate to her being black instead of fat and ugly. This woman has been exposed as a serial fabricator, with particular reference to her curriculum vitae. Okay, lots of people lie or at least exaggerate on their CVs, but this is a particularly risky business for someone in the public eye, and especially for one who professes to expose the foibles of others.

An even bigger comedian than Fat Connie appeared on this programme; Peter Saunders is the founder of the National Association for People Abused in Childhood. Incredibly, this organisation is a registered charity; in August, its CEO Gabrielle Shaw gave an interview to the Belfast Telegraph in which she suggested that former Prime Minister Edward Heath (who died in 2005) was part of the VIP paedophile network that is supposed to control Britain. The claims about this ring and especially about Heath have now been totally discredited as the ravings of sick minds, but Miss Shaw gave the game away when she said that one person coming forward with an historical allegation inspired another, who inspired another...There are in truth a lot of nutters out there.

Saunders says his childhood abuser preyed on him between the ages of 8 and 13. He doesn't say who this man was, although it was apparently not his father. As he never reported this alleged abuse, the only evidence we have that it happened outside of his head are his incoherent ravings, and what ravings they are. During the aforementioned BBC programme he claimed that in excess of a billion children are being abused every year including hundreds and hundreds of thousands in this country. Seriously? As there are less than two billion kids in the world that would suggest that if you pass ten in the street, perhaps on their way to school, five of them will be victims of abuse, however it is defined. It is a Holly Cost, he said, a Holly Cost! Well, if you don't like the Holly Cost, buy mistletoe instead. What an idiot.

Amber Amour (Twitter)

Now here is the classiest survivor of them all currently on the scene, her name is Amber Amour. She is a head case from New York City; she claimed to have been raped by a roommate in September 2014, although no charges were filed against her alleged attacker. This prompted her to start a campaign #StopRapeEducate – fair enough. In South Africa where she is promoting this message, she claims to have been raped again, this time at a hostel.

According to the lady herself, a guy name Shakir came on to her, but she rebuffed him politely. Then he asked her if she would like to shower with him, and she accepted, as any anti-rape activist would do, after all, don't teach women how not to get raped, teach men not to rape, right? She claims he then raped and bugged her before she passed out – she had been suffering from food poisoning. She has not only reported this rape but live blogged it!

Remember though, it is never the victim's fault. It was not her fault she decided to shower with a strange man in a strange hostel in a strange country, even if that man had already tried to kiss her. It is not her fault she is a poor, defenceless woman, and it is not her fault she is so gullible and trusting, even after the last time.

Shakir has been released on $75 bail, not a huge sum for such a serious offence. Naturally, his version is somewhat different from hers. The case is due to progress or not on March 29. Don't you get the feeling you're being played?

It seems that however ludicrous a story self-styled survivors come out with, the public worldwide is supposed to swallow it hook, line and sinker. It is not clear who is funding Amber's jaunt to the Dark Continent, but don't be surprised if this woman attracts even more publicity in the next few months, even if her tale is shown to be a total crock.
