

Anjem Choudary Exposes Government Hypocrisy

FEATURED NEWS POLITICS

By Alexander Baron

42
SHARES

Anjem Choudary is a controversial figure, one who revels in his notoriety. However, much of what he says makes sense when stripped of its fiery rhetoric. After the shocking murder of Lee Rigby in May 2013, he said the soldier would burn in Hell, a deliberately inflammatory statement which he know would be picked up by both the mainstream media and Islam-haters, but every Moslem, every Christian, every true believer holds to the same belief, namely that all non-believers will burn in Hell unless they come to Allah, Jesus, or whoever.

His views on Western intervention and meddling in especially the Middle East are likewise shared by most of the UK and indeed the American public; again it is not what he says but the way that he says it.

Here he is together with two fellow travellers ranting against the Home Secretary and the British Government in an impromptu press conference on Monday responding to the latest outburst from Theresa May. Whatever one thinks of them, they are intelligent men who make out an impressive case. Listen carefully to what they are saying and ask yourself if the offence they cause is not due more to their presentation than the substance of their arguments.

42
SHARES